Research during the past two decades has established that the diverse biological actions of 1,25-dihydroxyvitamin D₃ (1,25(OH)₂D₃) are initiated through precise changes in gene expression which are mediated by an intracellular vitamin D receptor (VDR).

The Vitamin D Receptor: New Paradigms for the Regulation

The function of 1,25-dihydroxyvitamin D₃, the biologically active form of vitamin D, extends from bone and mineral homeostasis to the control of cell growth and differentiation in a variety of ...

Regulation of target gene expression by the vitamin D

Vitamin D affects different genes in different tissues so this is only what low dose vitamin D does in white blood cells. Of the 291 genes, 82 genes were downregulated and 209 were upregulated. They found the affected gene pathways controlled immune function, transcription regulation, cell cycle activity, epigenetic modification, DNA regulation, DNA repair, and cellular response to stress.

Randomized controlled trial: Vitamin D and gene expression

Research over the past several decades focused upon several specific genes has shown that this activity is mediated the vitamin D receptor (VDR) which, following activation by 1,25(OH)₂D₃, binds as a retinoid X receptor (RXR) heterodimer directly to specific nucleotide sequences (vitamin D response elements or VDREs) located in regulatory regions of DNA , , , .
